Questions to help identify your feelings:

1. Do you not feel like yourself? Is something on your mind?
2. Do you not want to go to school?
3. Is something worrying you, so much that you don't want to go to school?
4. Are you having trouble sleeping?

Be sure talk to your family or another trusted adult about the above questions, and about how you are feeling if something is troubling you.

Feel your best, get adequate rest!

When we are tired, problems seem bigger and negative emotions are stronger.

Do you ever find your mind racing with thoughts when you try to sleep? This happens to all of us and there are some proven techniques to get your mind to slow down. When one doesn't work, try another.

- Change your what-ifs to if-thens: Worries often come to us as open-ended what-if questions. (e.g. What if I fail my test tomorrow?) We can close the loop on these thoughts by changing them to if-then statements. (e.g. If I fail my test, I will seek help from my teacher or smart friend.) After doing this with your most annoying worries, your brain will stop needing to spin them up over and over and will let you sleep.
- Keep a thought journal: Write all the thoughts down on paper, exactly as they are in your mind. This will stop the swirling thoughts. Do it for 10 mins or so and you will find that you are ready to sleep.
- Visualize a relaxing place: Close your eyes and picture every detail of a relaxing place. Include sights, sounds, smells, and touch. Engaging all of your senses is the key to pushing out the racing thoughts. Try to stay in this place for 3-5 minutes, then sleep.
- A change of scenery helps your mind reset: Leave your room to get water, go to the bathroom, talk to a family member, etc. Just don't turn on a screen!

Check your social media use

Pay attention to how social media is making you feel. If you notice that it leaves you feeling sad or 'flat', cut back on it.

Try doing a "digital detox" - taking 1 to 7 days off social media. The first day is hard, but then most people start feeling much happier.

Even if you enjoy social media, consider taking breaks for face-to-face time with friends, time to walk or enjoy nature, getting exercise or playing sports.

Manage Stress with belly breathing

"Belly breathing" is a skill that can be learned and practiced, and can be used automatically when we are feeling stress or anxiety.

Sit comfortably in a chair. Place one hand on your chest and the other hand on your upper abdomen, above your belly button, and between your ribs (over your diaphragm). Now, practice taking slow breaths, and focus on moving your bottom hand more than your top hand - that is abdominal breathing! You may wish to even count as you breathe --- breathe in to a count of three, and slowly breathe out to a count of three, pausing a moment between breaths. Slow, even breathing that is mostly from your abdomen can help you feel calm in stressful moments.
